"Beyond, Instead, Possible: Robert Barry and the Birth of Conceptual Art"

Sometimes you don't have to be a good painter to be an artist. Sometimes a good idea is enough.

Robert Barry, an artist with many good ideas, back in the sixties invented the telepathic works: a series of thoughts that are not communicated with written or spoken words, but with the power of thought.

Give it a try: think hard about an image that you would like to communicate telepathically to the visitors of this museum. It can be a detailed portrait of a loved one, an invented landscape or one you know well, a secret desire. Close your eyes tightly and send your message to the world using the power of your thought.

Write down below, maybe with your mum's or dad's help, what was the image you just telepathically transmitted: give it a title and a date, then sign it.

Here is your first conceptual work of art!
